To Whom It May Concern:

I've worked with Jonathan Fausset in a few separate contexts during the past five years. We originally worked together at a startup incubator/micro-VC firm where he was seeking financial backing for a feature film while simultaneously managing his own independent film company, Bishop Motion Pictures. We worked on drafting a business plan for his film, as well as other pitch materials to present to investors.

While we both moved on from those projects, we kept in touch over the last several years as he has transitioned into the tech industry. I currently work as a Solutions Engineer (Pre-Sales) for a MarTech company, and Jonathan is now a full-stack developer after completing a boot camp with CodingDojo. He has been able to translate his newfound skills to his most recent role as a full-stack engineer, and we often discuss potential business ventures and "side gigs" that could leverage our experiences and skillsets.

Jonathan is trustworthy, diligent, and reliable. He has always completed his share of the workload on time and often sought responsibility outside of whatever his current role may be. There are only a handful of people who I would trust implicitly in work settings, and Jonathan is on that list. His varied experiences, from his work in the motion picture industry to his current profession of software engineer make him a truly unique asset in the modern workplace. Additionally, his general life experience provides a valuable perspective on strategic decisions generally. Jonathan Fausset will be an asset wherever he lands next!

Best regards,

Steve
